Exploration of alternate currency

By Alice F

Another book by Edgar Cahn, founder of Timebanks. Members agree to give and receive services based on time equivalents, not money. In this book he describes how he was able to interest government agencies to partner with timebanks in providing needed services. As the "professionals" decried the sluggish response of volunteers, he says their complaints as a way to enable dependency. Hence his concept of "CO-Production". The end product of a society is not wealth but social justice. The core values of Timebanks are re-explained as a way to build and strengthen families and communities:

Co-Production is in fact a moral imperative:

1. Assets became: no more throw-away people
2. Redefining work became: no more free rides for the market economy through discrimination and exploitation.
3. Reciprocity became: Stop creating dependencies while profiting from their troubles.
4. Social capital became: no more dis-investing in families, neighborhoods, and communities.

Bringing back value to our communities

By Kindle Customer

This book explains the transformation that is happening all over the world using non-market economies by using co-production to bring back value to communities. The argument against Timebanking is that volunteers should not be rewarded; when one is volunteering more hours than another contributes to their workweek, it is no longer volunteerism, it is indentured servitude. I don't believe that there is not enough jobs, just not enough paid jobs. When the industry leaves an area, it does not take the skills and labor force with it. The deindustrialised area either becomes depressed, or the community creates a non-market economy to get some work done, until the market economy crawls back.

Thought provoking. I am thinking of getting a time bank started. This book gave an economics perspective.

To get an instruction manual on starting a Time Bank go to the Time Bank USA site.
